SINGLE CHOICE

California governors Gavin Newsom and Arnold Schwarzenegger have sometimes called California a "nation-state," implying that California is in some ways its own nation. How accurate is it to refer to California this way?

---

varlabel                      Nation state

required                      SOFT

- 1     Very accurate
- 2     Somewhat accurate
- 3     Somewhat inaccurate
- 4     Very inaccurate

SINGLE CHOICE

Suppose that a majority of Californians wanted California to peacefully secede from the U.S. and become an independent country. Would that be possible?

Pick the statement you agree with the most:

varlabel                      Secede from US possibility

required                      SOFT

order                          randomize

- 1     California could become an independent country with the approval of Congress, like Cuba and the Philippines did. (Do you strongly agree or somewhat agree? [Q6_1])
- 2     California could never become an independent country because the Civil War decided that states cannot secede. (Do you strongly agree or somewhat agree? [Q6_2])
- 8    Skipped
- 9    Not Asked

SINGLE CHOICE

California's economy is bigger than Canada's, and its population is about the same size.

Regardless of your answer to the previous question, imagine that at some point in the next ten years, California were to peacefully become an independent country with a friendly relationship with the U.S., like Canada.

Compared to the way things are now, do you think Californians would be...

varlabel                      Become independent country

required                      SOFT

- <sup>1</sup>     Much better off
- <sup>2</sup>     Somewhat better off
- <sup>3</sup>     Somewhat worse off
- <sup>4</sup>     Much worse off

SINGLE CHOICE

If California were an independent country, Californians would be...

---

varlabel                      Climate crisis issue

required                      SOFT

order                          randomize

- 1     Better off because we would be able to negotiate solutions to the climate crisis on a nation-to-nation basis. (Much better off or somewhat better off? [Q8_1])
- 2     Worse off because we would not have a direct say in the United States' approach to the climate crisis. (Much worse off or somewhat worse off? [Q8_2])

SINGLE CHOICE

If California were an independent country, Californians would be...

---

varlabel Democracy issue

order randomize

- 1 ○ Better off because under the federal system, California voters are under-represented in the electoral college and the U.S. Senate. (Much better off or somewhat better off? [Q9_1])
- 2 ○ Worse off because government in California would no longer be moderated by Congress and the Supreme Court (Much worse off or somewhat worse off? [Q9_2])

SINGLE CHOICE

If California were an independent country, Californians would be...

varlabel Guns issue

order randomize

- 1  Better off because we could adopt stricter gun regulations and control gun imports. (Much better off or somewhat better off? [Q10_1])
- 2  Worse off because we would no longer have 2nd Amendment rights under the U.S. constitution. (Much worse off or somewhat worse off? [Q10_2])

SINGLE CHOICE

Some countries, like the United Kingdom and Spain, grant certain parts of the country more autonomy over their own affairs, including health care, environmental policy, and how to spend taxes collected by the national government.

Suppose that at some point in the next ten years, California negotiated a special autonomous status for itself, giving Californians more control over decisions currently made by the federal government. California would still be part of the U.S.

Compared to the way things are now, do you think Californians would be...

SINGLE CHOICE

About 45% of California's land and nearly half of California's water infrastructure is owned and controlled by the federal government.

Supposed that at some point over the next ten years, California negotiated transferring ownership of nearly all federal land and federal water infrastructure to California's state and local governments. California would otherwise remain a regular U.S. state.

Compared to the way things are now, do you think Californians would be...
